Social justice depends on how governments and corporations make the key decisions that reshape people's lives. In housing, lending, health, employment, criminal justice and a host of other areas, those decisions are now being made with new tools and methods that did not exist when core civil rights protections were first established. Securing civil rights for the future will require making sure that these new systems, no less than the older ones they replace, reflect our shared values.

Equal Future aims to lay the foundation for this new conversation, mapping the changing landscape within which the struggle for social justice and civil rights continues.
